It might be doubted whether the whole range of ethical speculation could be covered in a short book, or whether, if it were done, it was done adequately. But the doubt, to my mind, is irrelevant. Ethics resemble science in that what is most promising is also most debatable. Old knowledge is nothing but the point of vantage from which we win new. Except for this purpose it is even, in a sense, unprofitable. So the aim of ethics should be, not to say all that has been said, but to establish new ethical relations, and, by means of these, yet others, according to the increasing subtlety and capacity of human kind. And this cannot be done by one man, or one book, however comprehensive. Comprehensiveness is, in fact, a drawback. I might have developed my opinions at greater length, were it not for the fear that the more they served me the less would they be likely to serve another. The value of thoughts is their value in exchange, and were the impress too individual they might lose this precious quality. We should like to be oracles. We should like to be immortal. But has nature so provided ? The thoughts of a man which are true pass into current speech, and his name is forgotten. If we are remembered, it is mainly in order to point out our mistakes. I write, therefore, not in the hope of prescribing the limits within which the future must walk. I have no wish to capture To-morrow and clip its wings. The question, as I see it, is not what I make of posterity, but what posterity...
